Bachelorette party invitations template

Of all the pre-wedding festivities, the bachelorette party could be the funniest. When was the last time you had the opportunity to gather your closest friends for a night or weekend of adventure and debauchery? (Whether PG or R is classified is up to you). And while the bride isn't usually as involved in planning the bachelorette party, all she has to say is on the guest list. And while choosing a group of your best friends to spend a weekend with would normally be a little brainless, the process becomes a bit stressful when combining different personalities, mixing groups of friends, and lots of accompaniment dynamics. So who gets an invitation and who doesn't? We'll break it down, with a little help from Amber Harrison. Meeting expert Amber Harrison is an authority on weddings and etiquette and was previously the head of weddings and branded content at Shutterstock. Normally, the bachelorette party is reserved for her bridesmaids and maybe some of her closest friends and family, Harrison says. This may change depending on the type of celebration you want and the activities you end up choosing. Start with a conversation with whoever you're planning and organizing the event with. Think about what kind of party you want, and argue with your bridesmaids so they can be clear about what (and with whom) you feel comfortable. Harrison advises. Ultimately, the guest list is up to you. The type of event you're comfortable with will also have a big impact on who you decide to invite. It is important to make sure that you are not only considering what you are comfortable doing, but also your guests. If the type of bachelorette getaway you have in mind seems to disagree with a certain friend's beliefs, it's probably best to exclude them from the invitation list and save them from an awkward trip. In this situation, and depending on your relationship, it may be better to explain your reasoning in person so that you do not feel belittled. Keep this in mind if the tables are turned around and you're in front of a friend who declines an invitation to participate for the same reasons. In the end, it's more important that you accept your friend's personal beliefs that you damage your relationship by their presence during some or all of the née activities. If you have a great relationship with your mom, aunt or other family member, go ahead and include them. Just remember to make sure that all guest list members feel comfortable participating or watching, including you. Harrison says. An afternoon in your favorite winery or a day at the spa? Invite Mom and your aunt to come. A weekend in Vegas? You may want to leave those family members at home. The last thing you want you, your best friends or your family members to feel during the party is discomfort or judgment. There are many other pre-wedding events, such as brunch and showers, to invite your loved ones from all stages ages so no one should feel out at the end. There's only one real guest list not to avoid. Don't invite anyone who hasn't received an invitation to your wedding, Harrison stresses. That goes for your shower, too. Otherwise, invite your heart to content. Just keep in mind that this is your bachelorette party, not your royal wedding. Invite only those special people you meet will bring you joy—that's right, Marie Kondo, that list of invitations—and contribute to a memorable, stress-free weekend. Considering some important factors, it can be easy and fun to plan a bachelorette party that the bride will remember forever, for the right reasons! The most important aspect for any bride-to-be is that their dearest friends and family attend their bachelorette. Therefore, it is important to make sure it is affordable for all your guests to attend. Before making specific plans or reservations, it's a good idea to suggest a cost-per-head to people on the guest list and make sure it's affordable. If not, the bride may prefer fewer items on the itinerary rather than having it closer and dearest nearby. Not only are they a great way to engage everyone, but they help create amazing memories (and photos) for the bride to treasure forever. When it comes to choosing the perfect activity, it is important to think first and foremost about the interests and affections of the bride-to-be. However, consider the guest list as well. An assault course may be a great choice for some hen parties, but not so suitable if all generations are invited - think about including Grandma! Even if the budget doesn't extend to paying for everyone's drinks for the whole event, supplying some cocktails or bubbles to start the night is a sure hit. If your bride-to-be doesn't drink, you could plan and mix a couple of different mocktail options. It is a good idea to have some non-alcoholic beverages available in anyone, even for guests who are in total, pregnant or breastfeeding. If the budget allows, booking a restaurant may be the simplest option. However, it is possible to serve a single woman on a budget. It is important to make sure that the food is delicious, but also easy to prepare. Prepared pizzas, fries and sauces, salads, cheeses and cold cuts can be prepared in advance and removed when needed. knape/Getty Images Games can be a fantastic way to keep the momentum in a bachelorette. They are particularly useful for breaking the ice if some party members do not know each other. A fun quiz about the bride and groom is a great way to start the night off. Pre-preparing some fun darings is also a great idea for later in the evening once drinks are flowing- ask each guest to contribute one to choose out of the hat. Of course, a lot of selfies will be taken in any case, but it's a great idea to create opportunities to make photos even more special. Providing cute and silly photo accessories like inflatables, funny hats or even comedy moustaches is a way to make sure the pictures are funny laughing. Making beautiful accessories like flower crowns can also make images more cohesive and super-stylish. SolStock / Getty Images Unless the bride-to-be and all her guests live locally, it is important to plan where everyone will lie down at night. At the very least, provide guests with links to local hotels to make it easy for them to book a place to stay at night. However, it is often more convenient (and fun) to book everyone to stay in the same place. Find out who will need a place to spend the night and factor this into the total cost. It is often cheaper to make a bulk reservation at a hotel or book an apartment for the night. g-stockstudio / Getty Images It's a great idea to schedule some downtime in the form of a mimos session on the calendar. If the budget is generous, book the entire party at local spa for treatment and recovery the next morning. Alternatively, arrange a beautician to visit the hotel for mani-pedis before going out at night. On a tighter budget, face masks and home beauty treatments can be purchased in advance to enjoy before you go out into town.
